Section 2 outlines a method for studying the development of the lyric. This method is based upon the hypothesis that the lyric persists throughout all cultural levels and that a history of its development should be traced, indeed, from ahigh plane of culture instead of from a low one, since, on a high cultural plane, the characteristics that define the type can best be determined. But before the connection between the two planes can be made the materials for study in the lower plane must be collected, verified, and analyzed, approximately in the way the materials of the higher cultural levels have been studied. Part II is a body of texts consisting of songs of the Bushmen, the Ekoi, the Torres Straits natives, the Veddas, the Zulus, the Baganda, the Masai, the Nandi, the Chippewa, and the Teton-Sioux. Part III, which consists ot four sections, discusses the influence of certain factors---method of delivery, musical accompaniment, occasion and purposo--in determining the structural characteristics of these songs. In section 1 it is shown that songs performed in connection with some physical activity--ritual or secular dance---are much more regular than those that chant in a reminiscent fashion the deeds of a hero or of a member of the tribe. In Section 2 it is shown that musical technique tends to determine the structure of primitive verse. To the simpler peoples musical expression is more important than the accompanying words, and the texts of...
