Not illustrated. 1909 Excerpt: .the exception of A, M, N, V and W, whose body lines are brought together to a sharp point, as in the French Roman. Another deviation are the slanted serifs of letters C, E, F, G, J, L, S, T and Z, necessitating contraction of the curved parallel lines at the ends, in order to make the connection for the point. The spurs should be made sharp and short, and all be of equal proportion. Roman Italics, (plate 14). After the construction of the Modern Roman letters has been mastered the Roman Italics offer no difficulties to the student. Instead of dividing the drawing paper into squares composed of horizontal and vertical guide lines, as for Modern Roman, the guide lines are run in diagonally, giving them the slant required by the Roman Italics. They should be placed at an angle of about thirty degrees, so as to form diagonal parallelograms of a width of three quarters their height. The curves of the letters of this alphabet may be drawn freehand, using the writing pen, and only Ornamental Roman the straight lines made with the ruling pen, guided by the T-square and triangle edge. Mechanical construction of the curves can be resorted to in extreme cases, if the letters are very large, but this style of lettering never looks well except when done with a light and graceful swing, and by using the instruments for their construction they are liable to become stiff and awkward...
